

Outstanding Black Women of Yalobusha County

tory and economics in the public-school system for 30 years. Though she officially retired in 1997, she worked part-time until 2001. However, she remains a presence in her former students' lives. Every time she sees them, they invariably express appreciation for how she taught them and made them feel worthy.

Dorothy says she is proudest that she stayed in an area where her skills were most needed – teaching students from low economic neighborhoods and those who did not desire or could not afford to go to the white private academies that sprang up after the mandatory integration. In a bit of turnabout, Dorothy noted that now many of her students offer their professional services to her.

Dorothy's parents provided her with what I would call a unique and atypical environment: no sharecropping, no servitude or reliance on a bossman. She and her siblings were taught black pride, independence and survival skills. They learned the value and benefits of owning land and saw firsthand the advantages and disadvantages of community service and civic duty. If I were to guess, no more than seven to 10 black families might have owned over 100 acres of land in Yalobusha County in the 1940s. Dorothy is deeply gratified that she and her siblings have held on to every one of the 160 acres that her family farmed. Her mom and dad would be so proud!

The 2015 book Delta Jewels featured Dorothy along with other black Mississippi women, and Congressman Bennie Thompson honored her with a letter of commendation, a certificate and a special mention on his website and Facebook page during Black History Month. Dorothy A. Kee is still teaching!

Dorothy A Kee: Through A Daughter's Eyes

By Syreeta Latrice Kee

When my grandmother, Clara Moody Smith, was pregnant with my mother – she would be the first of seven children – she and my grandfather, Clemmie, were in Spokane, Washington, where he was stationed in the Army. They hurried back to Mississippi before Dorothy was born because they wanted her to arrive in their home town of Coffeeville. They appreciated the importance of family, who were nearby.

Clemmie Smith's parents passed away early, and he and his brothers - all close in age - were charged with caring for their younger siblings. Strangely, all three of the ones attempting to run the household were drafted and sent into World War II.

With no one left to care for the younger ones, an older relative, Leora Ross, moved in to take over the reins. After Clemmie was discharged, he returned to the family home and decided to work the land. Leora, affectionately nicknamed Nola by his children, would remain with them for many years before moving to Chicago with her son.

A family of strong faith, the Smiths encouraged daily Bible reading and participated in all the services and activities at Smith Chapel Baptist Church. But while religious education clearly was important, the couple also emphasized secular education and hard work.

Given that the Smith's oldest three children were girls, Dorothy and her sisters handled many of the farm tasks usually given to boys. They milked cows in the morning before school, fed livestock, chopped and picked cotton and worked in the other fields, vegetable gardens and truck patches.

In good natured fun, Dorothy's siblings crowned her the slowest churner in the south. But she took it as a challenge: The more her family teased her, the more aggressively she churned and the better the butter was. She found an added benefit: She became faster at almost everything, and Dorothy credits this early-learned- and- earned discipline as catalyst for much of what she achieved later in life.

Though many strong women influenced Dorothy, her mother and Nola stand out. She not only admired Clara's sense of style, homemaking skills, kind nature and calm demeanor, but also her ability to stand her ground and to perform manual labor with seeming ease. Dorothy was especially amazed at how well Clara could take the least of things and make the best of things.

Nola kept Dorothy and her siblings in awe when she balanced pots of water on her head walking uphill from the spring, started fires from rocks, taught them to gather and prepare poke salad (sallet) and told their stories of days gone by. It never crossed their minds that she was simply living her cultural history.

In school Dorothy closely observed her teachers, marveling at the way they cared for so many children and were able to impart their knowledge and skill. Three made indelible impressions: Sara James, Elvira Jackson and Henrienne Williams. Though other career options were opening for black women, these teachers inspired Dorothy to follow in their footsteps.

Even though these were lean, substandard times in schools for Mississippi blacks, Dorothy still had fond memories of the many activities she took part in – field days, dramatic productions, oratorical contests and choral music competitions. These provided an outlet while fostering personal development, cooperation and competitiveness. Among the most enjoyable times were those when all the schools in the county gathered, and she would see the same kids she often saw at church events. They kept in touch by writing letters to one another.

Dorothy jokingly says her interest in history began early in life. To keep the kids from hearing "grown-folks talk," older people would send children to other areas of the house when they had company. Inquisitive, Dorothy led the charge to sit under an open window to find out just what this grown-folks business was all about. Despite not always knowing what the things she heard meant, she could repeat them word-for-word and still remembers some of those conversations today. She became the go-to person for family trees, obituary content and more.

Family members even older than her sometimes ask, "How do you remember when that happened?" "I don't," she tells them. "I remember hearing 'them' retelling it while we were eavesdropping outside." Years later, after graduating from Central High School at the top of her class, she would put these skills to use.

Dorothy remembers the year she graduated from Alcorn State University - 1967 - as a busy one. She graduated in May, got married in June and started teaching in Coffeeville in August. Dorothy joined her husband's family church, Pleasant Grove Baptist in Coffeeville's Bryant Community where she held numerous positions and participated in several ministries over the years.

However, she still serves as secretary, teen Sunday school teacher and a deaconess. She keeps busy serving on committees, boards and consulting among other things. Dorothy loves to read and encourages others, young and old, to read as well. Some of her other hobbies are watching DIY shows and attempting some of the features, cooking and writing.

She and my father, Nathaniel, have been married for 51 years and have two grown children, my brother, Kevin Erlander, and me, Syreeta Latrice. They have two grandchildren.

Looking back on her youth in comparison to milestones over the years, my mother is marvelously amazed by God's grace, and continues to celebrate His mercy and favor in her life.

Water Valley High School science students competed at the Regional Science Fair at the University of Mississippi on Wednesday, March 20. They emerged victorious, with all five students placing in the top three places of their categories. The group (from left) Rayvon Wilks (third place, Organic Chemistry); Tania Hawkins (first place, Physics and Astronomy and the Yale Science and Engineering Association Award); Anna Mills Avant (second place, Organic Chemistry); Maggie Ward (second place, Microbiology); and Mercedes Sims (second place, Physics and Astronomy). All five students are eligible to compete at the Mississippi Science and Engineering Fair on Friday, April 5.

Let's fight
colon cancer together.

Among cancers that affect both men and women, colorectal cancer is the second leading cause of cancer deaths in the United States.

If you're 50 years old or older, getting a screening test for colorectal cancer could save your life, either by finding precancerous polyps or detecting cancer early enough for treatment. So for your sake – and your family's – contact your physician and schedule a screening today.
